County officials visit Capitol Hill to stress importance of PILT, SRS

by Meredith Moran
staff writer

County officials traveled from across the country to advocate on Capitol Hill Sept. 15 for the Payment in Lieu of Taxes (PILT) and Secure Rural Schools (SRS) programs during NACo’s annual PILT Fly-in.

Because counties are not able to charge property taxes on federal lands, the PILT program helps local governments fund services including road and bridge maintenance, law enforcement, search and rescue operations, fire protection, solid waste disposal and environmental compliance.

Congress has fully funded the program since 2008 and it’s relied on by 1,900 counties, the majority of which are rural counties in the West. PILT received just shy of $550 million for the 2022 fiscal year.

Sen. Jeff Merkley (D-Ore.), U.S. Rep. Derek Kilmer of Washington state (D-6th), Lake County, Minn. Commission Chairman Rich Sve and Sublette County, Wyo. Commission Chairman Joel Bousman all discussed PILT and SRS at a briefing with visiting county officials in the Senate Russell Building on Capitol Hill.

“I think it’s worth acknowledging PILT payments aren’t earmarks — they’re not handouts,” Kilmer said. “They’re simply the federal government paying its fair share to communities that might otherwise struggle to generate revenue, because their communities are made up of a bunch of federal land.”

Merkley thanked the county officials for their dedication and commitment.

CA counties collaborate on juvenile justice

by Meredith Moran
staff writer

In response to California’s shift to a county-run juvenile justice system, 56 of the state’s 58 counties have created the Consortium, a 501(c)(3) organization that promotes collaboration among counties to best serve youth in the system based on specialized needs.

In 2020, California Gov. Gavin Newsom signed Senate Bill 823, which realigned the state’s juvenile justice system to county governments and began the process of closing the state’s Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ), which will be completed by the end of June 2023.

At its peak, the DJJ, formerly...

the run-up to its second anniversary with the release of its community violence strategic plan. The plan followed a steady increase in homicide death rates between 2014 (5 deaths per 100,000 population) and 2019, which saw a preliminary death rate of 10.1 deaths per 100,000. Studies found four durable hotspots of violent criminal incidences accounting for 8 percent of violent crime in an area comprising 0.3 percent of the county.

“We have a lot of communities across Mecklenburg County and across this country that have been disinvested in over a long period of time,” said Tracie Campbell, senior health manager in charge of Mecklenburg County’s violence prevention efforts. “Because of that, we got to the place that we are. There are a lot of inequities in health outcomes, there are a lot of inequities in education, in transportation, in housing, in food security — all of those things are things we’re working on. All those things are violence prevention.”

Mecklenburg County’s findings track with what the Brookings Institution has seen nationwide — not a dramatic increase in crime across the board, but spikes of gun violence in underinvested areas, which accounted for a 30 percent rise in the national murder rate between 2019-2020. In July, the Council on Criminal Justice found that homicides had decreased slightly in 23 major cities across the country of the second half of 2021.

Some of Mecklenburg County’s strategies include increasing community engagement, developing a community infrastructure development pilot project, deploying an emergency department intervention program, reducing recidivism through a jail re-entry program and trying to head off violent incidents. Much of the overall county effort encourages collaboration among disparate human service agencies and nonprofit organizations working on the root causes of poverty and inequity, tied together strategically. The county-led Carolina Violence Prevention Collaborative systematically coordinates the efforts of almost 200 community-based organizations working to address those insecurities and looks for the gaps in those services.

“A lot of those community-based organizations were not necessarily working together,” Campbell said.

“That’s not to say there’s nothing new happening in Mecklenburg County — the county and the city of Charlotte are each contributing $250,000 to fund a violence intervention program, an adaptation of the “cure violence” tactic, which embeds social service providers in high-risk communities, who then work to earn the trust of residents in need of help. From there, the “violence interrupters” can be a liaison between the community and human service providers on a regular basis. They also jump to action on demand: When a community member is wounded in a violent incident, the violence interrupter visits them and their family and friends to discourage retaliation.

But the comprehensive approach is what Campbell says will make a difference.

“Folks who are just planning to do one thing are not going to see the outcome that they’d like to see,” she said. “Not only does our violence intervention work — that’s happening on the street level — not only does our hospital-based violence intervention program work for us, but it’s all of these things collectively.

“This work is long and hard, and you don’t see the difference really quickly,” she noted. “It takes a while for you to actually see something happening, but you’re going to have greater outcomes when you collectively apply more than one of these strategies and work together. “That’s what we’ve seen across the country, that people are having great success or greater... because they’re doing more than one thing. You can’t be a one-trick pony.”

Cook County, Ill. is also targeting the roots that lead to violence, investing $35 million over three years in grants to neighborhoods and municipalities seeing the highest rates of gun violence.

“It’s no coincidence that our neighborhoods with the highest rates of gun violence, neighborhoods where people who do not feel safe, are Black and brown communities that have experienced the history of racism, police brutality and disinvestment and trauma,” County Board President Toni Preckwinkle told NACo’s Health Policy Steering Committee at the 2022 Annual Conference in Adams County, Colo.

“In a single weekend in Chicago, it’s tragically common to see a number of individuals injured or killed that would qualify for a description as a mass shooting,” Nicole Hendrickson, who chairs the Gwinnett County, Ga. Board of Commissioners, agreed with Preckwinkle that closing the resource gap in troubled com-urged them to make the most of their time in D.C.

“As I like to ponder it, everything easy is already done, so when you’re in public service, you’re still wrestling with one difficult challenge after another,” he said. “Thank you for taking that on for the strength of your community, your state and your country.”

“I just want to say to all of you, as you go about your meetings now that you’ve come here to stress the PILT program, please make sure you connect with special attention to those from your home state of course, because we need those members of Congress lobbying to the members of the Interior subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee in both houses [of Congress].”

In his address to his fellow county officials, Bousman noted the costs of rescuing visitors from public lands, such as the Bridger-Teton National Forest located in Sublette County.

“We’ve rescued an individual who went over a waterfall and was stranded in the middle of a creek in high water using our helicopter, and we have rescued multiple wounded horseback riders that would probably not have received timely medical attention otherwise,” he said.

“SRS provides local government with the resources to protect and save lives in these dangerous situations.”

SRS payments help rural counties and school districts affected by the decline in revenue from timber harvests on federal land fund services such as infrastructure, education, conservation projects and wildfire prevention programs.

“We have fiscal year ’21, ’22 [funded], but what happens at the end of that?” Merkley said.

FOREST SERVICE, INTERIOR REPRESENTATIVES

by Meredith Moran

County officials visiting the nation’s capital for the annual PILT Fly-In also heard from officials from the U.S. Forest Service and Interior Department.

Forest Service Chief Randy Moore and Department of Interior (DOI) Senior Advisor and Infrastructure Coordinator Winnie Stachelberg stopped by Sept. 16 to discuss intergovernmental partnerships and investing funds, as part of the “Overcoming Challenges and Seizing Opportunities: Implementing the Bipartisan Infrastructure Law” series hosted by NACo, the National League of Cities and the Bipartisan Policy Center.

Stachelberg referenced some of the current projects the DOI is contributing to, including a dam removal fish passage project in Maine, design of the Apostle Islands National Lakeshore Trail in Wisconsin and restoring watersheds in Zion National Park in Utah.

“There was a really interesting technology of how to water crops where there was no evaporation, where you just put the hose down right next to the tree roots so there is no waste for the water,” she said.

“We’ve talked to water districts about desalinization, we’ve talked to them about how to reuse and recycle water — not recycled bottles that had water — but actually recycle the water, and all of that comes from partnerships and conversations with people on the ground who are trying innovative technologies to ensure that the critical investment is spent wisely,” she noted.

Moore also emphasized the importance of establishing partnerships at the county level.

“As we look at trying to improve what we do out on the ground, we have to engage with people that are at those locations,” Moore said.

“... There’s a lot of different ways to get the job done, and it shouldn’t be done in the same way across the country — there’s just too much variation and diversity.”

The DOI is looking to identify projects that don’t just restore ecosystems and conserve land, but also make it more accessible to hunters and ranchers to ensure that public lands are for everyone, Stachelberg said.

“To me, it’s about breaking down silos, and it’s about partnerships and collaboration,” Stachelberg said to the crowd of county officials.

“I’m certainly not here to say that we at the Department of Interior have it right, but I’m hopeful that with the historic investment from not just the Bipartisan Infrastructure Law, but the other statutes as well, that with those dollars, we can work on leveraging the partnerships that we have with people like you, with your communities, to ensure that there’s the greatest impact for the American people.”

The Bipartisan Infrastructure Law invested $28.1 billion in programs, bureaus and offices at the DOI, $1.5 billion of which has been dedicated to the Office of Wildland Fire to work with the U.S. Forest Service and other organizations on wildfire prevention, fuel management, mitigation and revegetation.

Other significant investments include $11.3 billion toward the Abandoned Mine Lands program, nearly $1 billion to the National Park Service to hire more staff and prepare for the effects of climate change and $720 million in climate resilience and energy funding sent directly to tribes.

Over nine million schoolchildren rely on SRS to keep teachers in their classrooms.

"We want to make sure that young people can grow up in a community and stay in that community and have opportunities," Kilmer said. "That's really the direction here of these programs that you're advocating for -- making sure that the futures in Port Angeles, Washington or Forks, Washington or any of your communities can be just as bright as people who live in New York or Silicon Valley."

SRS title III county funding goes toward the Firewise Communities program, which educates homeowners on steps to reduce vulnerability to wildfires, including landscaping, community planning and home structure and design. Sve spoke to how much the program has benefitted Lake County, particularly during the 2021 Greenwood Fire. "Some of the structures that had taken advantage of Firewise survived the fire when their neighboring properties did not," Sve said.

"I had the fortune, or misfortune however you want to look at it, in viewing some of those properties personally, and it's really outstanding when you walk up to a Firewise property and the grass is still green and it's nothing but a smoldering ruin right next door."

Kilmer joked that he represents more trees than people and spoke to his personal investment in PILT and SRS fund-

Munities was an opportunity to reduce the economic pressures that drive people to commit crimes, crediting the American Rescue Plan's (ARP) $65.1 billion allocation to counties.

"Fortunately, federal funding that has been allocated to local governments to address pandemic-related issues has given us unprecedented opportunities to invest in those solutions for our residents who have so many different backgrounds, so many different experiences and circumstances and they have different needs," she said.

Gwinnett County has allocated $62.1 million of its nearly $182 million ARP allocation to equity-focused service provisions, allowing the county to expand its Health and Human Services model to enhance community resource support in targeted underserved areas. The county also invested $29 million to address the economic inequities exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic.

By directing their ARP funding to struggling areas, counties are hoping to make a difference in the lives of their residents, pierce the clouds of community disengagement and ultimately improve outcomes and reduce distrust of government. "That was one of Campbell’s goals while Mecklenburg County developed its community violence strategic plan. The county held a variety of listening sessions and focus groups with residents not only to glean information, but to reach out to residents.

"People don't think government listens, and when something is a problem and we don't think we're being heard, we become disgruntled," she said. "We were really listening to people and being upfront about why the plan was important. My hope is that community will see themselves in the plan and know that their input meant something. And that's how we'll make a difference."

Multi-vector approaches

● Harris County, Texas is trying to better allocate personnel to emergency calls through its Holistic Assistant Response Teams program. By assigning trained health professionals to respond to 911 calls related to homelessness, behavioral health, substance use or none\nemergency health or social wel\nfare issues, the county hopes to reduce the workload for law en\forcement by an estimated 21-38 percent of calls.

● Multnomah County, Ore. is funding a behavioral health gun violence response team. The seven-person team will include a combination of mental health clinicians and peers with gang experience and will coordinate with the Department of Community Justice's Juvenile Ser\\nsives Division to use therapeutic interventions to address under\nlying needs.

● In 2020, Anne Arundel Cou\nty, Md. launched a Gun Violence Intervention Team managed by a full-time health planner. The team meets monthly to discuss the work of subcommittees focused on three priority areas: data, public awareness and crisis response.

● Counties nationwide are funding gun buyback programs and collecting record numbers of firearms. King County, Wash. created a permanent voluntary safe firearm and ammunition re\n\nturn program within the sheriff's office. While the gift cards those buybacks offer may not deter criminals, the efforts reduce the number of guns in circulation and in households.

Counts get the handcuffs on gun regulation

While some counties are bringing in historic numbers of firearms in gun-buyback programs, particularly after the May school shooting in Uvalde County, Texas, counties have seen their ability to restrict fire\n\ms are curtailed by the U.S. Supreme Court this year.

"Before the Supreme Court's term this year there seems to be a bit more wiggle room but cer\ntainly after the decision this term, we're left with a much narrower window, but there still is oppor\ntunity to address the violence associated with firearms from a public health perspective," said Kathleen Hoke, director of the Network for Public Health Law's Eastern Region office.

New York State Rifle and Pistol Association v. Bruen still allows for places regulations, allowing governments to set reg\ulations for their buildings and property, but the decision criti\\ncized the landmark District of Columbia v. Heller decision for giving governmental entities too much power by having an inter\n\stablishing a balance in setting local gun control regulations. The rul\ing puts the burden on govern\ments when setting limitations.

"The government must now affirmatively prove that its fire\\narm regulation is part of the his\torical tradition to set boundar\ies on guns," Hoke said.

Increased federal funding to combat community violence

The Bipartisan Safer Communities Act, passed in June, contains several provisions and opportunities for funding for counties. It includes:

● More than $2 billion for school climate and school-based mental health services and $300 million in school security.

● Increased ability for the National Instant Criminal Back\nground Check System to access juvenile records, mental health records and contact local law en\forcement about an individual's history.

● Fines and prison time for in\dividuals who purchase a weap\on for someone else.

● $750 million over five years through the Byrne-JAG program for states to develop and imple\ment extreme risk protection order programs or as they are more commonly referred, red flag laws.

● $130 million for the imple\mentation of the National Suic\ide Prevention Lifeline (988).

● $250 million for the Com\munity Mental Health Services Block Grant and $240 million for Project AWARE, increasing awareness of mental health is\sues among school-aged youth, provide training for school per\sonnel and other adults who interact with school-aged youth to detect and respond to mental health issues and connect youth to care.

Introducing the Housing Solutions Matchmaker: A diagnostic tool that helps county officials

by Kevin Shrawder

County leaders understand the local housing conditions and challenges of the communities where they live and work. The Housing Solutions Matchmaker can help local leaders as they face complex decisions on how to invest scarce resources. The matchmaker provides local governments with a concise, accessible snapshot of housing conditions, focusing on a handful of key metrics, and places the locality in context relative to neighboring communities. The tool also provides resources on specific policy solutions that counties may be able to implement to support a healthy housing market.

First, the tool places each county housing-market category based on two metrics: Population change and the home value to income ratio.

Population change illustrates the community’s demand for additional housing over time, while the home value to income ratio primarily depicts challenges with affordability.

Communities with a growing population (high demand) need to build enough housing to accommodate individuals and families moving to the area. A community with a shrinking or stable population may still have affordability challenges but will typically focus more on maintaining the quality of existing homes rather than expanding housing stock.

Generating insights on affordability is slightly more complex. Affordability reflects both housing price or rent levels and how much income households earn: There is no single home price that is equally “affordable” to all households. Furthermore, there is typically a correlation between wages and home prices; people who live in high-cost-of-living areas often earn higher incomes. Because labor markets operate at the regional scale rather than within single cities or counties, the matchmaker calculates housing affordability as the ratio of the median house values within each county and the median household income for the metropolitan area (or state for counties not in a metro area).

High-priced counties may look affordable to those currently living in that county but unaffordable to typical households in the broader metro area. Housing affordability challenges — and solutions — benefit from a region-wide approach: for instance, many people work and live in different counties within the same region.

In addition to classifying counties by population growth and housing affordability, the Housing Solutions Matchmaker provides county-specific profiles that guide users through selected housing supply, affordability, and quality metrics to understand local conditions better.

A key findings table helps explain how individuals should interpret these metrics and communicate their findings to others.

Finally, the tool provides a series of policy recommendations to help guide county leaders in undertaking data-driven decisions.

The policy recommendations are linked to each county’s specific population growth, affordability, and quality metrics. Though they do not provide a detailed implementation plan, the resources can help leaders chart a general direction for policy solutions based on community needs.

Recognizing that local governments vary in available resources and legal powers, no single comprehensive strategy works for all places. Instead, the tool provides a data-informed assessment, referring local officials to resources supporting county leaders’ continued actions to improve local housing stock’s affordability, quality, and supply.

The tool does not aim to provide resources for all housing challenges, such as homelessness or mixed-use residential and commercial development. County leaders can find information on additional topics outside the scope of the Housing Matchmaker Tool on the “Resources on Other Housing Topics” tab on the tool’s homepage.

The Housing Solutions Matchmaker tool is a joint effort from NACo, the Brookings Institute and the Aspen Institute. View your county profile and associated housing resources at www.naco.org/MatchmakerTool.

ARPA funding fuels two-generation approach to family services

by Charlie Ban
senior writer

Escaping her old life in Nebraska was just the first step for Paulina Gutierrez. Fleeing an unstable, abusive household, she needed a fresh start for herself and three daughters, one of which was a newborn. But she couldn’t rest once she got home to Colorado.

Her mother could shelter the four in her apartment, but that wasn’t a long-term solution for anyone in the family. Gutierrez found one in the GOALS program — Generational Opportunities to Achieve Long-term Success — administered by the Family Tree, a local Arapahoe County, Colo. nonprofit.

“At the lowest point in my life, they cared,” Gutierrez said. “They went above and beyond to get my daughters what they needed and made sure we had stable housing. They pushed and pushed and pushed and made sure it happened.

“All throughout my life I was always in situations where someone would say something and then they wouldn’t do it, or they’d take advantage of you,” she said. “This was different.”

A year later, Gutierrez has earned a GED, secured housing for her family and found a job. The organization also helped Gutierrez secure a home health nurse to see to a job. The organization also helped Gutierrez secure a home health nurse to see to someone who needed help.

The organization’s four-building campus in eastern Arapahoe County serves families who are experiencing homelessness, giving them a place to stay, up to nine months. A handful of human services organizations occupy one building. And the organization has plans that its share of the ARPA funding will accelerate: Family Tree will soon start renovating one building to house five classrooms that will serve 70 children, ages 6 months to 5 years in the GOALS program and surrounding Aurora, a community in a “childcare desert.”

“Without ARPA funding, I would honestly say we would not be at the phase where we are,” said Family Tree CEO Scott Shields. “We probably still honestly [need to] be in a fundraising mode.

“What we heard from many of our partners during this time is that finding capital dollars to do renovations or other construction projects, especially in the last 2.5 years, has been hard to come by, so this was a really, really critical support.”

The county’s investment unlocked additional funding from the United Way, helping Family Tree finish its fundraising ahead of schedule.

“It was that confidence that Arapahoe County and the Board of County Commissioners saw using once-in-a-lifetime ARPA funds to make this happen, that’s really giving us the opportunity to create this vision and make it a reality,” Shields said.

The gathering restrictions and physical distancing regulations during the height of the pandemic challenged Family Tree’s service delivery model, but to be able to make dramatic progress on long-term planning 2.5 years after the pandemic started has given Shields a great deal of optimism.

“The hardest part during the pandemic was supporting our team, who had to work face-to-face during a very scary and uncertain time,” he said. “We continued to provide excellent high-quality services during that time with reduced occupancy to enable physical distancing with signing up for utilization kitchens and common space areas.”

Gutierrez didn’t notice when she came there for help, though. “My first interaction was very hopeful,” she said. “I know I can always come here if I need resources for anything.”

Keeping people housed

Even as other Denver-area counties sought her organization’s services, Megan O’Byrne wanted to work in Arapahoe County. After setting up eviction clinics in Denver and Adams counties for Colorado Legal Services, where she is a supervising attorney, O’Byrne got the call she wanted.

“We had our eye on Arapahoe County because it has one of the highest eviction filings in the state,” she said.

The clinic places two attorneys and a paralegal in an office near the county courthouse three mornings a week, helping tenants draft answers to eviction filings, preventing them from receiving default judgments. The attorneys take on some cases, pro bono. Having an eviction on their records makes it harder for tenants to find new housing, to say nothing of the disruption the process means for their safety and long-term health if they lose their place to live.

“We are able to at least buy them time to continue getting rental assistance money,” O’Byrne said. “Our clinics are able to help some of the most vulnerable populations in that county and also be able to save [the county] money in the back end because evictions are so costly to the community in terms of healthcare and safety resources.”

While Arapahoe County had approached Colorado Legal Services earlier about establishing the clinic, it took federal funding to make it happen.

“Without ARPA, this program would not exist,” O’Byrne said.

Tashay Turner was referred to the eviction clinic by a courthouse clerk.

When she faced eviction, Turner was able to place her daughters with relatives, but all bets were off for her and her mother.

“Without their assistance, I would probably be on the streets because the lingo, the knowledge that they know that you don’t happen to know, is very helpful,” Turner said.

Most landlords have attorneys, O’Byrne said, which puts most renters at a disadvantage, particularly low-income renters.

“Legal proceedings are not necessarily made for people without lawyers,” she said.

Turner said rising housing costs are surprising many people who felt secure with their family budgets only months ago.

“A lot of people I know are making decent money, but it’s just not enough anymore,” she said. “It’s really hard for people to even try to find housing in general because of the prices and the wages that [employers

Katherine Smith, Arapahoe County’s community resources director, said giving residents a way out of that would guide the county’s ARPA spending.

"Our lower-wage workers who didn’t have that ability to work from home may have had challenges with childcare and we and we still see some of that," two years later, said Katherine Smith, Arapahoe County’s community resources director. "Now our focus with our dollars for business support has been really strongly around retraining," she said. "It’s focused on how we can ‘upskill and reskill’ and get people either back to work or in a higher level position so that their income is higher."
NACo/Nationwide scholarship winners share thoughts on retirement readiness

For 19 years, the NACo/Nationwide scholarship essay contest has been an educational opportunity for high school students transitioning into a new stage of their lives. Engaging young people in civic life and responsibilities is an important way to show high school students the valuable roles counties play in their residents’ lives. The program’s goal is to help ensure that young people get involved and stay involved in local government — and understand the importance of being good stewards of their future finances.

Children and grandchildren of NACo 457 Deferred Compensation Program contributors were eligible to apply for this scholarship. They were asked to write a short essay on the importance of retirement readiness, especially when considering the impact of Covid. The winning entries were submitted by:

- Rebecca Yetter, Sussex County, N.J.
- Chad Philpot, Coconino County, Ariz.
- Alyssa Gomez, Riverside County, Calif.
- Alyssa Murray, Bartholomew County, Ind.

In their essays, each student communicated the importance of preparing financially for retirement in response to the following question:

The recent COVID pandemic has impacted the way we approach and plan for many of life’s decisions. As we turn the corner on the challenges that we have faced over the past two years, what lessons can we learn as it relates to “Retirement Readiness?” As you formulate your response, please consider lessons learned and how you would approach the following when you graduate college and start planning for your financial security: Use of Employer Sponsored Retirement Plans, Budgeting, Asset Diversification, Emergency Funds and Financial Literacy. As you consider your response, you may also want to consider the following economic levers that may impact Retirement Security: Healthcare Costs, Social Security, Market Risk and Increasing Life Expectancy.

Each winning senior received a $2,500 college scholarship from Nationwide and the National Association of Counties.

Yetter

Rebecca Yetter

Hi! My name is Rebecca Yetter. I will be majoring in Business Management at the University of Central Florida. My goal is to eventually own a business, one that might help make a positive impact on society. I love being outdoors, as well as spending time with friends and family. In high school I was part of several clubs. I was given the opportunity to volunteer so much of my time to those in need, and I plan on doing that again in college and beyond. I also was involved in a business club, which I plan on doing again. I am super excited to see where my interests and goals bring me!

Gomez

Alyssa Gomez

My name is Alyssa Nicole Gomez and I am 18 years old. I was born and raised in Riverside County. I have one younger sister who is a sophomore in high school this year. I graduated from Heritage High School in June 2022 with honors. During my high school years, I played both club and high school soccer, was a member of the California Scholarship Federation and was a youth leader at my local church. In the fall, I will be attending the University of California-Irvine where I will be pursuing a degree in Mechanical Engineering. My goal is to graduate with my bachelor’s degree in 2026 and make a difference in the world.

Philpot

Chad Philpot

Chad Philpot will be attending Northern Arizona University this fall where he will be majoring in Biology. Chad believes people’s lives are improved through the love and companionship of a pet and he desires to become a veterinarian, a goal he has had since first grade. He enjoys dirt bike riding, fishing, camping, archery, weightlifting and visiting national parks with his family. Chad is honored to be recognized with the Nationwide/NACo College Scholarship which will help him achieve his long-term college and career goals.

Murray

Alyssa Murray

My intended college major is Business Management. I may continue my education with law school or graduate school for a master’s in Business. I am a direct admit to the Kelley School of Business at Indiana University. Aside from my studies, I enjoy dancing and intend to join dance clubs at Indiana University. I am passionate about staying up to date on current events and making myself knowledgeable about political issues. I very much enjoy spending time with my family and friends.

An opioid addiction recovery program that has reduced overdoses in Palm Beach County is expanding to 12 counties across Florida as Coordinated Opioid Recovery (CORE), a network of addiction care.

CORE is Gov. Ron DeSantis’ (R) response to Florida’s rampant opioid crisis. The state had more than 8,000 reported overdose deaths in 2021 — its highest one-year total ever recorded — and fentanyl-related deaths have increased by 790 percent since 2015.

Palm Beach County’s addiction treatment program has 400-500 patients receiving care at any given time from physicians, psychiatrists, addiction-specialized therapists, nurses and other health care providers, according to Robin Kish, director of media relations for the county’s Health Care District.

“We probably had the highest number of overdoses in the state, certainly one of the highest in the nation,” said Commissioner Melissa McKinlay. “It was crushing our community. I think we had somebody overdosing every 11 minutes in our county — we were losing on average more than two people a day.”

In the late 2000s, South Florida was home to a robust “pill mill” industry of unregulated pain clinics that issued prescriptions for opioid-based painkillers with minimal examination. Counties passed ordinances that closed most of them a decade ago, but millions from Florida and beyond were already addicted.

Palm Beach County dedicates about $1 million a year to its addiction treatment program, so that anyone seeking care can receive it, regardless of their ability to pay, so the financial burden doesn’t fall on the hospital, McKinlay said.

“This public-private collaboration provides a unique ecosystem where patients can receive treatment for their Substance Use Disorder (SUD) in the ER for the most acute stage of their illness, as well as a continuum of care right after discharge at the Health Care District’s outpatient clinic for as long as it’s needed,” Kish wrote in a statement. “Since SUD is a lifelong illness, this approach affords patients access to quality care on an ongoing basis.”

The pilot program was initially just for patients at HCA Florida-JFK Hospital in West Palm Beach who had been taken to the emergency room due to an opioid overdose. As the program grew, the hospital created a formal outpatient clinic and Addiction Stabilization Unit (ASU).

“The way that we’ve molded the program now is anybody can walk in, and we tried to do that where, at least with our ASU we have a triage program, if somebody comes in off the street, our staff then tries to determine, ‘Do you need inpatient? Do you need heavy outpatient? Can we come and treat you in your home?’” McKinlay said. “Like, ‘[what is] the best option?’ And then the other thing that we tried to establish was if you’re the parent or the loved one of somebody going through addiction, you can pick up and call and ask for guidance in trying to find help.”

Looking ahead, McKinlay said the county has dedicated $10 million to $12 million from the American Rescue Plan Act to tackle mental health and substance abuse issues.

“That mental health piece is so key, because a lot of addiction issues are a result of those self-medicating, because they’re not addressing their mental health issues,” McKinlay said.

The recovery program has been successful in Palm Beach, with drastically lower relapse rates among those participating in the program versus those who are not. Brief addiction monitoring assessments, which are self-reporting questionnaires that pertain to mental and physical health in relation to sobriety, have also shown that patients’ average protective factors go up and risk factors go down, according to Kish.

The counties involved in the first phase of CORE are Brevard, Clay, Escambia, Gulf, Marion, Pasco and Volusia, and phase 2 will be Citrus, Duval, Flagler, Manatee and Pinellas.

DeSantis publicly announced the program during a visit to Brevard County. “We don’t want Floridians to receive overdose treatment and then simply be sent back into the world for this to happen all over again, so we’re trying to give them the tools they need to navigate their path to a productive, drug-free future,” DeSantis said at an Aug. 3 press conference. “We have to work to try to break the cycle of addiction.”

Last year, the Brevard County Sheriff’s Office saw a 72 percent increase in fatalities related to fentanyl, prompting the county fire and rescue agency to relaunch the Project Care and Share program, which provides Narcan to families and loved ones of drug users, so they can save a life in case of an overdose.

The program was initially created in 2019, but was paused because of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Brevard was approached by the state to be a part of the CORE network, because it already had the infrastructure in place for it and the county had worked with organizations like the Florida Department of Children and Families to address the opioid crisis, said Orlando Dominguez, junior assistant chief of emergency medical service operations at Brevard County Fire Rescue.

Dominguez said that although the county is only in the beginning stages of implementation, he “absolutely” thinks Brevard will benefit from CORE.

“We know that there’s a problem, and we’re addressing this no different than our focus on cardiac resuscitation, on heart attacks, on strokes, on trauma,” he said. “We’re faced with this opioid situation and we’re addressing it aggressively to hopefully allow opportunities for recovery for these victims.”

The Saline County Fairgrounds hosts the annual Missouri State Corn Husking Championship, which is set for the end of September. The goal of the competition is to husk as many ears of corn, in a timeframe ranging from 10 to 30 minutes, as cleanly as possible. Points are deducted when competitors leave an excess of husks on the ground, so many use husking hooks, which are essentially leather straps with a blade, for efficiency.

Pandemic Prompts County to Create Teen Mental Health Media Campaign

PROBLEM:
The COVID-19 pandemic increased feelings of isolation, anxiety and depression in youth and parents weren’t equipped to deal with it.

SOLUTION:
Provide resources for youth seeking support in a way that appeals to them and encourage parents to have broader conversations around mental health with their children.

Amidst a mental health crisis among youth exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic, Chesterfield County’s Communications and Media and Mental Health Support Services teamed up with the Youth Citizen Board (YCB) to create a media campaign, “Mental Health Is a Puzzle, But We Have the Missing Piece,” targeted at Chesterfield teens and parents.

Anxiety, depression and eating disorders in teens increased during the pandemic, and according to a CDC survey, 44 percent of high school students reported persistent sadness or hopelessness.

A primary goal of Chesterfield County’s campaign was to broaden the conversation around all aspects of mental health, not just suicide prevention, said Melissa Ackley, Chesterfield Mental Health Support Services’ prevention services manager.

“Even before the pandemic, we’ve heard from youth, ‘you train us on how to recognize or respond to signs of suicide, and that’s great, but we’re struggling so much earlier and with so many other things — we’re struggling with anxiety and eating disorders and [other] mental health concerns — and when the only thing you talk to us about that’s mental health-related is if you’re having thoughts of suicide, or you’re recognizing thoughts of suicide in someone else, that leads us not to talk about the other things,” Ackley said.

The YCB is made up of Chesterfield high school students and functions as a way for teens to participate in local government and advise the county’s Board of Supervisors on youth-related issues.

Chesterfield’s Mental Health Support Services trained the YCB on safe messaging related to mental health and the county’s Department of Communications and Media trained the students on the logistics that go into an effective technology campaign. Planning for the campaign started in September 2020 and it ran on social media through April into May 2021 in honor of Mental Health Month.

The aim of the campaign was to reach both students and parents, so content posted on social media channels was tailored to the platform’s demographic.

Instagram has a much younger user base, so the campaign’s Instagram posts focused on accessing local and national resources for seeking help, while Facebook attracts an older age group, so the Facebook posts dealt more with encouraging an open dialogue around mental health, said Susan Pollard, director of Chesterfield County’s Department of Communications and Media.

“My generation] didn’t grow up talking about mental health,” Pollard said. “We didn’t grow up thinking, ‘Boy, if someone’s struggling with mental health issues, you should talk to them and not about them.’ Whereas these kids have grown up being really comfortable talking about mental health, and what they were telling us was, ‘When we do say something to our parents, they flip out or they cry, or they shut down,’ and so part of what we knew that we needed to do was give parents tools for having those conversations.”

With schools operating online due to the pandemic, Chesterfield’s Mental Health Support Services saw that parents were struggling to recognize and respond to signs of mental health concerns, Ackley said. The CDC found that teens having a sense of being cared for, supported and belonging at school is important for mental health, but fewer than half of youth reported feeling close to people at school during the pandemic.

“We were seeing this outcry from parents who were used to having the schools be the mental health safety net for their kids,” Ackley said.

To expand the message’s audience beyond those who already followed the county’s social media accounts, posts included the hashtags #BreakTheStigma, #MasterTheMind and #YouAreNotAlone and the YCB utilized traditional media outlets, doing interviews with NBC12, Richmond Family Magazine and Richmond Magazine.

Three YCB members also co-wrote an op-ed on the importance of teen mental health awareness that was published in the Richmond Times-Dispatch.

The campaign reached more than 40,000 people across social media platforms, and its potential reach was greater than 212,000 for print media and 550,000 for broadcast. The page view for the YCB’s website, which directed users to mental health resources, increased by 18,000 percent.

“Something that has been heavily emphasized to me over the past year is how important constituent voice is,” Ackley said.

“I think so much of what made us successful is that we weren’t just listening to the people that we wanted to serve, we were involving them in creating and implementing it, which is why the campaign made its mark.”

The LOS ANGELES COUNTY Board of Supervisors voted unanimously to waive citizenship requirements for government jobs. The exception to the motion is for positions in which being a U.S. citizen is required by state and federal law, including Los Angeles County Sheriff jobs and any county-appointed position for peace officers. Los Angeles County Public Defender Ricardo Garcia said in a statement that cultural, racial, ethnic and religious barriers oppose the county’s core values.

“This motion, by Supervisors [Hilda] Solis and [Sheila] Kuehl, will promote equity in hiring and give the Public Defender’s Office access to the most qualified applicants for employment, irrespective of their citizenship status,” Garcia said. “An immigrant’s experience will advance our vision, mission and values to protect our clients’ legal and human rights and enable us to more readily realize my goal that our employees fully represent the demographics of the population that we serve.”

COLORADO
BOULDER COUNTY’s Navigating Disaster program has gone digital, launching a website for those affected by last year’s Marshall Fire and seeking disaster relief help. The site creates an easy process for those in need of support to make appointments with a recovery navigator, who helps with a variety of services, including connecting individuals and families with legal and insurance claim advisors and referrals to mental health services. The program is funded by Boulder County and the Community Foundation of Boulder County’s Wildfire Fund.

“Recovering from a disaster can take a toll both mentally and physically,” Katie Arrington, Boulder County’s assistant disaster recovery manager, said in a statement. “Those impacted by the Marshall Fire know there is a lot of paperwork, procedures to follow, and deadlines to make, all while trying to manage the needs of their everyday life. We want to help relieve that burden as much as possible.”

LEE COUNTY has implemented two programs, The Low-Income Home Water Assistance Program and the Low-Income Home Energy Program, to cover past-due water and electric bills of county residents whose income is at or below 150 percent of the federal poverty level. The assistance programs are the county’s response to inflation and rising costs and are projected to benefit around 5,000 families.

LEON COUNTY is installing menstrual product dispensers in county facilities, including the county courthouse, libraries and parks, in an effort to bridge the gap in “period poverty.” The dispensers will provide free pads and tampons to accommodate women who might not otherwise be able to afford them. Twenty-one percent of women in the county live at or below the poverty level and one-third of low-income women in the country miss school or work because they don’t have access to menstrual products. A local organization, the Oasis Center for Women and Girls, also recently partnered with the Junior League of Tallahassee on the Giving Sustainability Grant awarded by national non-profit The Pad Project that will provide $17,000 worth of reusable period underwear to women in the community.

GEORGIA
FULTON COUNTY’S solution to a lack of affordable housing? A neighborhood of tiny homes. The county is devoting $1 million in funds from the American Rescue Plan Act to build six to eight homes smaller than 500 square feet on a half-acre of county land. Prior to the 6-0 Fulton County Commissioner vote in favor of the pilot program, Chairman Rob Pitts said, “These tiny homes are a thing of the future. [This is] an opportunity for us to set an example nationally for other local governments to follow.” Tiny house initiatives created with the purpose of combating housing insecurity have also popped up in Ventura County, Calif. and Bozeman, Mont.

HAWAII
MAUI COUNTY is establishing a “safe sleeping zone,” which will allow its unhoused population to sleep overnight in their vehicles on county land. The County Council unanimously approved the bill, which was created as a response to rising housing costs and limited shelter space. The one-year pilot program is set to launch as early as October and the preferred site will be The J. Walter Cameron Center, which provides meeting space for social service agencies and is near Maui Memorial Medical Center and the Maui Police Station.

MISSOURI
The JEFFERSON COUNTY Health Department has secured $700,000 in local, state and federal grants for a pilot program that includes making mental health support accessible to students, KSDK-TV reported. A waiver signed by parents or guardians allows students to take a mental health self-screening tool. Based on their answers, students receive a risk level. After screening is completed, a counselor is alerted, who connects students with appropriate resources.

A BRUNSWICK COUNTY Library program will give children a chance to practice reading aloud to an eager audience: a therapy dog named Bailey.

Books for Bailey aims to improve children’s confidence and literacy skills during occasional events held at various branch locations. Children also receive a sticker showing that they have read to Bailey, a 9-year-old Collie who has served as a therapy dog for seven years.

“Read to a Dog” programs are a great asset to reluctant readers and other students who just need that confidence boost,” said Library Director Patricia Dew. “The children who are able to participate here are gaining reading and literacy skills that will benefit them throughout life.”

- CAMDEN COUNTY is offering $1,000 in relief funding to caregivers from a $1 million allocation of its American Rescue Plan Act funding.

Eligible caregivers provide hands-on, direct assistance including functional living skills and basic care needs, like feeding and toileting. Perform a low- or moderate-income position including care attendant, caregiver, home health aide, hospice aide, institutional attendant or nurse aide; work in institutional settings (nursing homes and hospitals), assisted living facilities, independent living arrangements, group residential homes, schools for individuals with special needs, adult and youth day programs and/or private homes.

- BURLINGTON COUNTY launched a program called LIFT UP: Lunches & Information For Tenants and Underserved Populations. County staff last month connected with more than 150 residents at a lunch session to assist them with a wide range of issues and provided information about available assistance, including SNAP benefits, mortgage and rental aid, utility and home repair assistance and the county’s first-time homebuyer program.

The county’s Department of Human Services planned the events – a series of lunches throughout the county – as an extension of the services offered by the County Housing Hub.

The thing about e-bikes, scooters and other micro-mobility devices is that however easy it is to pick one up and get going, it’s just as easy to leave them anywhere, including spread across sidewalks. ARLINGTON COUNTY is installing 100 street parking spaces for the child’s caregiver permits the child to view the video.

- With staffing demands threatening early childhood operations, CALUMET COUNTY is offering six quality support specialists to come to the aid. The Early Childhood Stabilization Program uses $700,000 in American Rescue Plan Act money, in collaboration with Child Care Resource and Referral Fox Valley, to offer help with a variety of needs, The Post Crescent reported.

The program offers free classes that are required for any assistant or lead teacher, offered sign-on bonuses, tuition discounts for children of childcare providers and other benefits that reduce costs for childcare businesses, while helping them recruit or train employees.

WISCONSIN

- The BROWN COUNTY jail is creating a reading program for children to spend quality time with their parents, remotely. The “Making Reading Memories” project is a partnership between counties and Literacy Link — a University of Wisconsin-Madison, Division of Extension, program.

Interested parents, who are legally able to be in contact with their children, take a class explaining the program and the significance of reading to kids. Parents choose an age-appropriate book and record their reading of the story. Once their recording is viewed and approved by jail administration, the recording and a copy of the book are sent to their child if the child’s caregiver permits the child to view the video.

SANGAMON COUNTY’S plans for the Double Black Diamond Solar Project are in motion and construction for the 4,100-acre solar panel plant is set to begin later this year. The plant is estimated to power 85,000 homes throughout the state, get all of Chicago’s facilities on renewable energy by 2025 and create 1,000 jobs during construction. It will also benefit local schools and the community through its tax revenue, Sangamon County Board Chairman Andy Van Meter said in a press release.

- DALLAS COUNTY is helping low-income, first-time homebuyers master the process with a home-buying seminar. The Upfront Cost Assistance Program is a collaboration between the county’s Home Loan Counseling Center and Health and Human Services department.

The Upfront Cost Assistance Program offers an eight-hour home buying seminar for low-income, first-time home buyers. Topics include financing, selecting a Realtor, understanding title companies and more. Applicants who meet certain financial requirements can receive help with a down payment, a loan that is forgiven if the resident lives in the home for at least five years.

I can’t really run a strong girls program or I can’t run a strong sex offender program. So, for those kids, I’m going to want to broker that out to another county that is doing that.”

Sonoma County has agreed to provide a regional program for sex offenders and will sign contracts with individual counties, Richart said.

“That’s one thing the Consortium is going to do is help figure out what those contracts look like and streamline them so they’re consistent and it’s not, you know, ‘El Dorado County is contracting with Sonoma and that looks one way, and then Amador is going to contract with San Diego and that looks like a whole other thing,’” he said. “We’re going to bring consistency to it so there’s consistency in the resources being offered and the way that money is changing hands and the way that kids are being treated. We don’t want there to be a ‘justice by geography’ thing.”

One of the first goals the Consortium has worked on is putting together a template memorandum of understanding (MOU), which is a formal agreement used to coordinate inter-agency work, so that counties don’t have to start from scratch each time they want to contract or share a service, Pank said.

“Like, how can we break down some of those barriers so that we’re not recreating the wheel every time something comes up?” Pank said. “But it gives counties a tool to start, and it gives counties a place to problem-solve on some of these very specific issues that pop up as we are moving into this more decentralized service system.”

Two California counties, Los Angeles and Shasta, are not part of the Consortium. The primary reason for that is because how many resources they already have, Pank said. “L.A. has a lot of their own resources, a lot of their own politics and a lot of their own ability to probably solve a lot of these problems on their own,” Pank said.

“So it wasn’t that they opposed the [Consortium] — in fact they do work with us collaboratively within CPOC and CSAC contexts. They’re very supportive, I think it just wasn’t as necessary. "Shasta’s a little bit in the same boat too — they have a great facility and they have a lot of programming that they’ve already put in place.”

Although Los Angeles County might have more resources than other counties, it’s still facing challenges with the shift to a county-led system, particularly with staffing, said Helen Chavez, assistant chief of staff of communications for Los Angeles County Supervisor Kathryn Barger.

“My boss, Supervisor Barg er, has been a big proponent of providing holistic mental health support, recuperative care types of services — addressing trauma and substance abuse addiction, disorders,” Chavez said. “All of that takes people power and making sure there’s enough probation staff and multidisciplinary staff available. So, there are dollars set aside, but even when you set aside dollars, getting the bodies to fill the positions is another challenge that a probation department is trying to find its way through.”

Moving forward, counties receiving sustainable funding, taking into account data and having both authority and flexibility in crafting their local system will be key factors, Knaus said.

“What’s the success rate? How do we define success? Are the outcomes improved over what they would have been at the state? Are they the same? Are things going backwards? Understanding that is really important,” Knaus said.

Although CPOC and the counties opposed the transfer, now the priority looking ahead is making sure it has the best outcome as possible for youth, Pank said.

“Our concern continues to be the unanswered question — Will we continue to get the support? And will people listen to the experts in the system, which we contend are counties and probation specifically in this case,” Pank said. “We think it does have the potential to be a success and better for youth.

“The way in which it was done didn’t set us up for success, but we do think we might be able to turn the ship, and that’s what we’re trying to do now … we can’t really afford to let it fail because these are our kids in our communities.”

‘We can’t really afford to let it fail, because these are our kids in our communities’
